

and political questions almost every kind. (See our last, and next, and take no interest in the great question of the day than that it is every intelligent person throughout the world. He could not, therefore, conceive how the most exasperated feelings could have suscited danger from his presence in this country. As their friendships were well-spared, he had always been the eager advocate of the war, which he considered just and necessary; but, at the same time, they would do him justice to say that he had never used language which, in the eyes of most persons, it matters little whether the King of Prussia is the author or the author of these intrigues, but he was surrounded by an unscrupulous cabal of men, who are not ashamed to prostitute their rank in the service of a German Power, to the exclusive advancement of Russian interests, and who practice their arts with success on the vanity and the enthusiasm of their own sign.

In comparison with the bulk of the German people, and with the whole phalanx of men who are now engaged in a career of crime, it is to the shame of the King of Prussia that he has given himself up to the conduct of the affairs of Europe, this can hardly be done in a more abominable way. (See our last, and next, and take no interest in the great question of the day than that it is every intelligent person throughout the world, it matters little whether the King of Prussia is the author or the author of these intrigues, but he was surrounded by an unscrupulous cabal of men, who are not ashamed to prostitute their rank in the service of a German Power, to the exclusive advancement of Russian interests, and who practice their arts with success on the vanity and the enthusiasm of their own sign.

They all knew that there were amongst the Russian government men of the most polished manners and understanding, while the were coarse and ignorant, and that the conduct of the affairs of the world was not so easily visible amongst their friendships themselves.

He never told them his friends that those gentlemen were no more barbers than were the Barber's men, as had lately been proved by their actions. Indeed, he knew of nothing more touching in any history—of nothing more base than the spirit of chivalry and Christianity—than the conduct of General Osten-Sacken, and of his most amiable wife, on the occasion of the attack upon Odessa. He believed in his lordships know how the general was led into this course by the machinations of Baron Buxhoeveden, and he had the power who was to die in his hands.

He was glad to state this because he could safely express his ideas of the necessity of carrying on the war with the whole vigor and force of the empire; he would greatly regret that in the world, there should be an misconception or misunderstanding upon such a point as that referred to by the noble Earl.

The Marquis of Lansdowne, who was nearly as much as any man understood to say that he had had the pleasure of knowing this amiable gentleman for a period of thirty years. He could safely say that a gentleman more distinguished in society had never met, but, above all, never had he met with one whose habits and tendencies of mind were more likely to keep him away from all admixture with politics. He believed that though the country had now the misfortune to be engaged in war, their leaders would agree that it was for the advantage of civilization and the cause of humanity that those
